Introduction

Records confirm the presence of Nabataean groups in the Sinai Peninsula, Petra and Transjordan in the 4th century BC; the “Nabataean state” was probably established around a pre-Nabataean population, which gradually absorbed visitors and expatriates who, though not Nabataean, were considered as such for administrative and political purposes.<sup>1</sup> The information provided by the sources<sup>2</sup> not only sheds valuable light on the origin of the Nabateans,<sup>3</sup> but also enables their history to be sketched out with a fair degree of historiographical and sociological rigour.<sup>4</sup>

According to the sources, Nabataean groups started to migrate during the Persian period, along a trans-Arabian trade route linking southern Babylonia to the Nile Delta. The route, used by the Nabataeans during the Hellenistic period, was still extant during the Early Islamic period, though by then linked to their new settlements in the Hawrān<sup>5</sup>.

The fall of the Ptolemaic and Seleucid empires enabled the establishment of a strong and relatively autonomous state. Although neither its ethnic diversity nor the languages and scripts used by its people can be determined with any certainty,<sup>6</sup> in time this state came to be regarded as “Arab” in documents of all kinds; and more than one of its rulers was styled “king of the Arabs” (ὁ Ἀράβων βασιλεύς).<sup>7</sup>

Given these sociohistorical circumstances, a diachronic linguistic analysis would clearly conclude that the language of the Nabatean groups arose through affinities and contacts between what might be termed the ‘Nabatean Aramaic-Arabic dialect’ and the dialect used by Mesopotamian Arab groups during the Neo-Assyrian Period.<sup>8</sup> Even so, this linguistic hybridisation was undoubtedly heightened by contact with other languages; especially Greek but also, obviously, the various Aramaic dialects spoken in the surrounding areas.<sup>9</sup>

This note focuses on the term ‘lyt’, whose meaning – though widely inferred from the context – has not yet been fully defined. The word appears in one of a set of inscriptions from the Ba‘alshamīn temple complex at Sīr (Hawrān), near the Decapolis city of Qanawāt,<sup>10</sup> a major religious centre and probably a focus of pilgrimage.<sup>11</sup>

The Nabataean text and its Greek version, of which various editions have been published,<sup>12</sup> are shown below, followed by the English translation:

examination of 'lyt':<sup>14</sup>

'upper' (fem.) is the meaning made clear also by the Greek verb ὑπεροικοδομέω, 'build on top of' or 'build the upper part of'. The precise meaning is not in the end clear: perhaps a vertical extension, or an extension on higher ground?

In this context, the term 'lyt', clearly points to an upper or raised room or chamber, in this case of the temple (byrt' = τόιερὸν),<sup>15</sup> which is referred to explicitly in the inscription, although the dimensions of the space indicated by the term are not defined.

The Aramaic-Nabataean form 'lyt' is de facto a pan-Semitic term, and cognate forms are thus to be found in the Semitic milieu,<sup>16</sup> e.g. in East Semitic languages such as Akkadian, as elītu(m), with a similar meaning in Middle Assyrian and Neo-Babylonian.<sup>17</sup> It also occurs in Northwest Semitic, for example in Ugaritic ('ly)<sup>18</sup> and Hebrew 'aliyyah(הָלֵעַ)',<sup>19</sup> which correspond in the LXX to: ἀνάβασις, προκοπή and ὑπερῷον.<sup>20</sup> The term is recorded in Aramaic dialects: Palmyrene 'lyt' (ܠܴܻܲܰ), inscriptional Aramaic 'lyt' (לִעַ),<sup>21</sup> Biblical Aramaic in the suffix construction 'illītēh' (הִלִּיעַ),<sup>22</sup> Targum Aramaic 'lyt' (לִיעַ),<sup>23</sup> Judaeo-Aramaic 'lyt' (אֶלְעַתְּ),<sup>24</sup> Palestinian Christian Aramaic

The semantic field covered by the term can thus be defined as relating to the concept of height or elevation, as it occurs with Hebrew תַּלְעַ (2 Sam 18:33; 2 Kings 1:2) or its plural form תַּלְעָה (Jer 2:14). The semantic field is in turn bounded by the term byrt' (= τὸ ἕρον), so it can be inferred that the author of the inscription is referring to an upper ‘room’ or ‘chamber’. It might usefully be noted in this context that, in the Gospels of Mark and Luke, the ‘Last Supper’ is reported as taking place in an “upper room”.

The two passages run as follows:

a) Mc 14:14-15

δέ διδάσκαλος λέγει· ποῦ εστιν τὸ κατάλυμά μου ὅπου τὸ πάσχα μετὰ τῶν μαθητῶν μου φάγω; καὶ αὐτὸς ὑμῖν δείξει ἀνάγαιον μέγα έστρωμέν ονέτοιμον

“Teacher asks: Where is my guest room, where I may eat the Passover with my disciples? He will show you a large room upstairs ready”.

b) Lc 22:11-12:

λέγει οιδιδάσκαλος.
ποῦ εστιν τὸ κατάλυμα ὅπου τὸ πάσχα μετὰ τῶν μαθητῶν μου φάγω; καὶ κεῖνος ὑμῖν δείξει ἀνάγαιον μέγα έστρωμένον

“The Teacher asks: Where is the guest room, where I may eat the Passover with my disciples? He will show you a large room upstairs, all furnished”.

The term used in both texts is ἀνάγαιον (lat. cœnaculum),<sup>29</sup> which in Greek denotes an ‘upper room’.<sup>30</sup> Interestingly, the term ἀνάγαιον is rendered in the Pešiṭtā and in the old Syriac Gospels by ܐܠିତ୍ (‘elītō),<sup>31</sup> also with the sense of ‘upper room’. The fragmentary Syriac Diatessaron uses the term ‘elītō’ (ܐܠିତ୍),<sup>32</sup> which in the Arabic version is translated as ‘illiyyah’ (علیّة).<sup>33</sup> Moreover, both Syriac versions add the adjective ܪାବ୍ତା; (rabtā) to render the Greek μέγα, which itself is clearly intended to denote a large room or chamber.

The idea that this term was used to refer to a large space can also be inferred from the information provided by Ishū‘dad de Merv in his Commentary, to the effect that the room (ܪାବ୍ତା) served as a church (ܥକ୍ରମ) and a meeting-house (ܩୁହୁସ):<sup>34</sup>

"Now our Lord arranged with the master of the upper room (...) It served the disciples as a church and a meeting-house, until the destruction of Jerusalem".

The desire to specify that this was a large room is found only in the redactions of the Mark and Luke Gospels; elsewhere, therefore, it would appear that the term was intended to denote a room, without specifying its size; this may also be true of 'lyt' in the Aramaic-Nabataea inscription, although in both cases confirmation can only be sought through archaeological or textual evidence.
